

On-the-fly configuration and fast delivery of service compositions leave little time for verification. Therefore, pre-verified templates, either domain-specific (as the Waternet example of C3) or domain-independent, are desirable. We present a technique to create provably correct service compositions from correct templates, where verification is basically reduced to a "compatibility check" of the participating domain knowledge and small side-conditions.